Further passive constructions We use passives when we want to focus on who or what an action affects. Most tenses can be made passive by using the appropriate form of be + [[1]]. Passives can also appear in the following contexts: a. After modal verbs Profits can be invested in cultural projects. We form passives after modal verbs using be + [[2]]. b. As -ing forms The city parted for days after being awarded the Olympic Games back in 2019. We use -ing passives after [present participle] g. since, for, by, despite, after, except, like, over) c. In reporting The Olympics is often said to be the place for countries to prove their greatness. In some writing, we often use the passive form of reporting verbs + [a past participle] He is rumoured to have stolen millions. Millions were rumoured to have been stolen. To emphasise something happened earlier, we use a reporting verb + [] () d. In reduced relative clauses and if clauses An article which was published online provided evidence of widespread corruption. When we use passives in relative clauses, we can leave out the relative pronoun and the verb. If needed, we could provide support. We sometimes do the same with an [[7]]. e. In combination with another passive construction The stadium really has to be seen to be believed.
